Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: ... (28) I have shown you all these women, I see the good there is in each of their beauties; and now you are glad that, notwithstanding or because of my so seeing, I hold you the best. You understand, then, that the fleshly beauty does not unduly attract me, but that I look at bodies in order only to learn minds 1 that it has been the inward grace, not the outward beauty which allured me, and that the coarsest earth covering may be transpierced by a spark from heaven. All this has come of demonstrating the value of Fifine. (29) And indeed, even her virtues, such as they are, illustrate the world somehow and have their triumph. Because it is my belief that every creature has once in its existence the supreme moment when Gods sun shines on it, and lets its truth be seen and valued, as any one grain of sand may for once take the suns light on its most prominent facette. (30) Fifine is no adamant shield like Helen,--Asian mirror like Cleopatra,--Oriel pane like the Pornic Saint. Still, may she not be like a bit of glass on a dunghill? For, the moment the sun strikes it the piece of glass shines as bright as your diamond. (31) Let her be defiled as much as you choose to imagine, she does not seek to hide her defilement; she even calls attention to it to rouse your pity. You say, a girl of my breeding would have died under the treatment she has had; she must be made of other flesh and blood than mine, with a power in her to live through degradation, a power that can only be possessed by the naturally vile. Surely she was not wronged too much; she would not have felt as we should feel. S (32) Be it so; but can you wonder that the one appeal, the only claim she makes, should find my heart sympathetic? Her absolute
