

A Motley Jest: Shakespearean Diversions (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Motley Jest: Shakespearean Diversions
An island in the Middle Seas. A cave is seen on the right and before it, under a palm tree, Caliban is discovered sleeping. Enter Trinculo and Stephano, quarreling. Trinculo. Since the day when the old gentleman they call Prospero took it into his bald pate to disappear into air along with a most goodly company beside, there's not a bottle to be found i this isle, as I am a good Christian, and, what is more, a good Christian mans son. Stephano. Bottle me no bottles, Trinculo. Had we neer shared a battle betwixt us we had not been left to bide by ourselves in this whoreson isle in the hard service of the man-monster, Caliban, but might be in fair Naples at this very hour. Trinculo. Sagely said, Master Stephano. Thou wast ever wise enow i the tail o the event. An thou couldst have looked it thus wisely i the mouth, thou hadst been a made man, Stephano, a made man, and a householder, to boot. About the Publisher
