

A Probable Italian Source of Shakespeares Julius Caesar (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Probable Italian Source of Shakespeares Julius Caesar This Prologue is a literary curiosity. Its style is at times more reminiscent of the madrigal than of tragedy, while the very earthly ?avor which clings to the celestial personages is decidedly humorous to the modern reader. Pescetti un doubtedly was in grim earnest when he wrote the Prologue, but many of the sentences he puts in the mouths of his im mortals must have made Melpomene smile. The admonition of Venus to Mars on omniscient Joves approach, Ma e vien ver noi, tacciam, chegli non ci oda, despite its Renaissance setting, is delightful for its sheer absurdity. The tragedy follows immediately after this prologue. In view of the extreme length of Pescettis work and the lack of interest for our purpose in many of the speeches, I have thought it advisable not to in?ict upon the reader an extended synopsis of the plot, but to confine my efforts to the following outline of the story.
