

Amerikan Sunset

The airlines aren't flying. How are three people supposed to travel a thousand miles and then leave the country after the federal government defaults on the national debt? Alexandra, beautiful and spoiled, decides to leave her home in Ohio to join her fiancé, Michael, in Mobile, Alabama, from where they plan to depart the crumbling remnants of America. On her journey, she is accompanied by Liz, a close family friend whose reason for making such a dangerous expedition is to join her mother in Montgomery and to offer her assistance through the coming economic and social crisis. Nick, Alexandras brother and platonic friend to Liz, joins the mission of offer protection to the two women. Their adventure begins as they depart Ohio in Nicks truck, but as all forms of government checks begin to bounce, including payroll and welfare, the economic structure of society breaks down to the point that gasoline becomes unavailable and lawlessness is the norm. When gasoline becomes unavailable, the trio must continue their daring mission on bicycles. As their hazardous expedition progresses, they encounter armed thugs roaming the highway, a rapist who fears nothing from police who no longer have any authority, and junkies who have taken possession of a remote pharmacy. Only after Liz endures the harrowing ordeal of a violent assault, followed by the unjustified murder of her mother, can her sarcastic, tough-as-nails attitude erode to reveal the true and deep feelings that she has for Nick. Even as the very fabric of society unravels, a glimmer of hope sparks as regular citizens try to reorganize and go on with their daily lives, attending weddings, a birth, and a funeral. When the three travelers finally reach their destination, the struggle to get there has transformed them in surprising ways, just as the country has been transformed, forever.
