

A Daughter of the Manse: A Novel (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Daughter of the Manse: A Novel It was a beautiful May morning, the last day in the month, when Frank Whitfield, with a book in his hand, wended his way to a quiet, secluded spot near the edge of the wood, and took possession of a rustic seat that rarely had an occupant. He did not open his book, however, but sat dreamily looking about him, now and then taking deep inhalations of the soft breeze, that came laden with refreshing woodland fragrance. Directly behind him lay a stretch of fields, with here and there a group of cows grazing peacefully, and beyond ran the main road to the village of Clover Hills, the taller buildings and church-spires of which were plainly seen, silhouetted against the deep blue sky. Directly before him was the wood, the most charming view to be seen from where he sat. The branches of many trees wove a roof above his head and shut out all the glare, and bathed the place in a mellow light.
