Not illustrated. 1854 Excerpt: ...his brother, it was not his wish that he should sustain any personal injury; and he desired them to treat him with the greatest respect. La Force replied, that if the duke led his troops, such courtesy could not be practised in battle. The cardinal perceived that, if compelled to act, it would be but feebly, and likewise feared that, being forced upon a duty they did not like, they might be corrupted: the kings delicate health made such derelictions more than probable. It was therefore determined that the king should take the command in person. Monsieur, in this hazardous enterprise, was made painfully sensible of the penalty attached to his previous want of good faith; not a single governor would join his standard in all the provinces he passed through. Most apprehended the kings death; all hated the cardinal. A prince, with his claims and injuries, possessed of the 238 CHARACTER OF GASTON. qualities of a leader, and an honourable character, would have won hosts of adherents; but he could not be trusted in any way. All knew that it was for his own selfish interests alone that he wished to seduce them to rebel; and that, for these interests, he would as readily sacrifice a friend as a foe. We cannot fancy a more contemptible character than Gaston of Orleans. As heir presumptive, he knew the cardinal did not dare to touch his person; and lje was constantly entangling in his cabals subjects who jeopardized everything, and, in most cases, lost their lives, for a man who, as it has just appeared, never incurred any danger. After all, what were his injuries P--that he could not have money enough, or offices to produce it, to supply his vicious pleasure, and maintain an injurious cabal in the court: he was too selfish to permit us to think that his mothers wro...
