Rings were the hardest to make. That is what made them so special. To produce one ring of metal for a finger or an arm without seam and tapered so finely as to include design and story was an impossible task. To do it twenty times and fold the metal into itself over and over again was a practice long forgotten and never relearned. That is, forgotten by all but one. flattened steel was used with varying levels of concentrate. The concentrate name was also forgotten. He had never heard it spoken. The art of forge welding dated back centuries and he was the last. The patience required to fold and refold and to find the right metals, repeating the cycle until some form of perfection was reached would have been unattainable for most men. The metal, the more it was worked, became strangely lighter and stronger. Thousands of Barbarians flooded west of the Rhine in the wake of Attilas lust for power and unquenchable thirst for blood. Men wandered the plains and forests looking for a place to belong. Their stories lost in the mud and tracks made by wagons. Their loyalties lost and their sense of place and meaning eroded. This made them more dangerous than soldiers or gladiators or even the Hun. They became wild animals and fought for themselves. Some formed packs like dogs but a few wandered alone and sometimes once in a while, they wandered into a fight they had all but forgotten The Armourer is Hildebrand. Exiled in disgrace twenty years before from his birthplace, the Burgundian forged his name in blood under the service of Honorius, Emperor of Rome. The lands would shake until the mountains fell into the sea and the birds fell out of the sky. Hildebrand he dreams of being back in his beloved homeland. Returned to a family he destroyed and to a son and daughter of whom he knows nothing. Some will live, many will die and some dreams can never be realised.
