

Facing Myself

On 12th February 2011, Zoe Cohen stood alone on Crosby Beach among the Gormley statues. Tears rolled uncontrollably down her face as she was engulfed by misery and despair. Despite a loving family, wide circle of friends and a successful career, her overwhelming desire was to chain herself to one of the statues and be drowned by the incoming tide. Facing Myself is about depression and how a woman in her forties finally confronted and overcame the mental illness which had been with her since adolescence. Vivid, cathartic and raw, the poetry charts the stages of the journey from self-loathing to acceptance: the anguish, the cries for help, the upswing as the help arrives, the determined walk toward the door which leads out of the darkened room. At times harrowing and emotionally draining, Facing Myself is ultimately about hope.
