

He Loved but One, the Story of Lord Byron, and Mary Chaworth (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from He Loved but One, the Story of Lord Byron, and Mary Chaworth It was a strange night - breathless and soundless beneath a hot iron dome studded with innumerable stars. Looking at these stars one had an oppressive sense of peering through tiny holes in the iron door of a furnace at the seething flames within. That is what the boy on the horse thought when his mad gallop had ended, and the animal had recovered its breath and drunk at one of the shrunken pools of the mill-stream. There were nights on which he had looked at the stars, and they had seemed to him as the moth-holes in a mighty, violet velvet pall, through which the gleam of the golden streets of the heaven beyond was apparent to him; and there were nights when he had seemed to see the quiver of accursed fires through the piercings in the pall. This was one of them. The night was like a wild beast crouching - breathless - silent - cruelly cunning - waiting to leap upon its prey. That was his next fancy; no boy that ever lived in the world had so many imaginings - so fantastic an imagination. The night was a wild beast, with a glossy black skin, and he was its prey - he could see its fiery eyes glaring at him. He was at this time looking at the stars from beneath a canopy of foliage; for where the alders of the mill-pond become sparse an avenue of poplars straggled on to the knoll. Wheresoever his eyes looked he saw the red, fiery eyes of the beast glaring at him. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
