Not illustrated. 1878 edition. Excerpt: ...no joking matter. I have lost ten thousand pounds by that beast. Ten thousand pounds! Yes; that is to say I ought to have won it, and I didnt; that is what I call losing it; and I have lost nearly three thousand pounds. You would be astonished if you knew what I had lost since May. _ Nothing would astonish me in that way, Dick, answered _the other gravely. You lost your wits, in my opinion, when you won your first stake at Epsom. Aye, that was a good haul, wasnt it? said Richard, brightening up a little. If we could only do that sort of thing every day, but somehow, since then, everything has gone quite contrary. Heres the end of the season, and hardly a chance left of recouping oneself. That is fortunate at all events, answered the other_d_ryly. Not but that you have plenty of ways of ruining yourself, _beside horse-racing, before the season begins again. No doubt, answered Dick, laughing, I could check five or six of them off at once on my fingers----- I I Check them, but not on your fingers, interrupted Greene sardonically. I am sick and tired of telling you what a fool you are. However, I am come this morning to humour your taste for extravagance. You shall take some stalls at the theatre where my play is coming out. Your play! Oh, Pussy, Im so glad. So you have got these stage villains to appreciate your talents at last. I will take twenty stalls. Is it that five act Thingamybob? No; it is not the tragedy, if that is what you mean by the Thingamybob. It is that rather neat little comedy (if I may say so)...
