Not illustrated. 1899 edition. Excerpt: ...against her money for the last month or Ah, shes got it all. The dentist went away from his bootless visit to his wife shaking with rage, hating her with all the strength of a crude and primitive nature. He clinched his fists till his knuckles whitened, his teeth ground furiously upon one another. Ah, if I had hold of you once, Id ma.ke you dance. She had five thousand dollars in that room, while I stood there, not twenty feet away, and told her I was starving, and she wouldnt give me a dime to get a cup of coffee with; not a dime to get a cup of coffee. Oh, if I once get my hands on you! His wrath strangled him. He clutched at the darkness in front of him, his breath fairly whistling between his teeth. That night he walked the streets until the morning, wondering what now he was to do to fight the wolf away. The morning of the next day toward ten oclock he was on Kearney Street, still walking, still tramping the streets, since there was nothing else for him to do. By and by he paused on a corner near a music store, finding a momentary amusement in watching two or three men loading a piano upon a dray. Already half its weight was supported by the drays backboard. One of the men, a big mulatto, almost hidden under the mass of glistening rosewood, was guiding its course, while the other two heaved and tugged in the rear. Something in the street frightened the horses and they shied abruptly. The end of the piano was twitched sharply from the backboard. There was a cry, the mulatto staggered and fell with the falling piano, and its weight dropped squarely upon his thigh, which broke with a resounding crack. An hour later McTeague had found his job. The music store engaged him as...
