Not illustrated. 1876 edition. Excerpt: ... turned toward hers. Well, daughter dear, well just do the best we can for him, and it wont hurt him to try roughing it in the backwoods--or prairies rather--for a little while. Well, its a little better than if he had come while we were in the old yellow house. Weve a nice porch here, and a front yard shaded with grand old oaks; and no neighbors near enough to watch every movement A good many conveniences, too, added her mother, cheerily, and a beautiful view of river and town. I think, too, that we can manage to give him a room to himself, and to feed him well, with the help of Ruperts garden, the cow and the chickens. The expectation of this visit was a real blessing to the family; to Mrs. Keith and Mildred in especial--just at this time; giving occupation to their thoughts as well as hands, in the necessary preparation for the proper accommodation and entertainment of the coming guest; thus preventing much of the sadness the loss of Miss Stanhopes loved society would have caused them. The next arrival of the semi-weekly stage brought Horace Dinsmore, his servant and luggage to their door. Mr. Dinsmore was a dark-eyed, handsome youth of distinguished appearance and with the air of a prince of the blood royal; yet evidently a kind master; for his man John, a spruce young negro, seemed to take the greatest pride and pleasure in waiting upon Massa Horace and anticipating his every wish. While warmly welcoming her young relative, Mrs. Keith was somewhat dismayed at the unexpected sight of the servant--house room being so scarce; but the difficulty was obviated by placing a cot-bed in the empty loft of the newly erected stable at the foot of the garden.

How very thoughtless and selfish in Cousin
Horace to bring that fellow...
