

The Mills of the Gods: A Novel (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Mills of the Gods: A Novel It was the last night of the Carnival in Rome. During the past eight days the fantastic Harlequin of Mirth had disported himself on the Corso, amid the rainbow-decked balconies, where laughing-eyed women displayed their beauty in coquettish, flowery warfare; at every window of the high, dull houses, which broke out all over in smiles, and ogles, and vari-colored streamers; and down in the narrow street, with its contrary flow of carriages, - flower-and frolic-laden, - and its jostling crowd of masques and confetti-intoxicated roysterers. And now the evening of Mardi Gras rides rollicking over the boisterous waves of humanity, which had roared and rolled high in the fury of condensed excitement all through that sunny day which ushered in Ash-Wednesday.
