

Blazing Woods

The town of Carlin in Nebraska is dominated by the woodland known as Blazing Woods. The woods are said to have got their name because at sunrise and sunset on certain days of the year they appear to be ablaze. For two centuries they have exerted a powerful, many would say tangible influence over the local populace. The woods are an integral part of the towns culture. There are legends and tales about the woodlands going back to the dawn of time and which speak of something coming to Blazing Woods and causing a conflagration. The children sing a song about The dancing fiery men. It is a song which they have learned from their parents who in their turn learned it from the previous generation and so on. The townspeople treat these colourful cultural outpourings with a level of scepticism. They do not however discount them completely for everyone in Carlin knows there is something vaguely supernatural about these woods and everyone has their own tale to tell when pushed to do so. When plans are announced to construct a highway through the woods and to develop the area the locals are up in arms. Their opposition to the development provokes an unexpectedly murderous and violent reaction. What they are unaware of is that behind the development is an international criminal organisation known as The Consortium and they are determined to succeed at whatever the cost. The woodland however has its own strange and unique defences and will show itself to be a merciless adversary. When workers from the construction company enter the trees in order to begin work on the development they find themselves battling for their lives in the most perilous and baffling circumstances. This is just the start of a battle which will see the loss of many lives.

A child, David Fomentry seems to have a special affinity with the power in the woods. He is a child with a congenital heart condition and yet he seems to have been chosen to be a conduit for this power and a rallying point for opposition to the development. For this reason the Consortium are desperate to capture the boy and use to him to further their own ends. The story takes us through murder, kidnap, political intrigue, attempts to physically destroy the woodland and its terrifying supernatural power.
