It is true, said Heriot, in some embarrassment; there is a large sum wanted in redemption--yet, if it is not raised, there will be an expiry of the legal, as our lawyers call it, and the estate will be evicted. My noble--my worthy friends, who have taken my cause up so undeservedly, so unexpectedly, said Nigel, do not let me be a burden on your kindness. You have already done too much where nothing was merited. Peace, man, peace, said Lord Huntinglen, and let old Heriot and I puzzle this scent out. He is about to open--hark to him! My lord, said the citizen, the Duke of Buckingham sneers at our city money-bags; yet they can sometimes open, to prop a falling and a noble house. We know they can, said Lord Huntinglen-- mind not Buckingham, he is a Peg-a-Ramsay--and now for the remedy. I partly hinted to Lord Glenvarloch already, said Heriot, that the redemption-money might be advanced upon such a warrant as the present, and I will engage my credit that it can. But then, in order to secure the lender, he must come in the shoes of the creditor to whom he advances payment. Come in his shoes! replied the Earl; Why, what have boots or shoes to do with this matter, my good friend? It is a law phrase, my lord. My experience has made me pick up a few of them, said Heriot. Ay, and of better things amongst with them, Master George, replied Lord Huntinglen; but what means it? Simply this, resumed the citizen; that the lender of this money will transact with the holder of the mortgage, or wadsett, over the Estate of Glenvarloch,
