The course was then straight up this glacier (a little W. of N.), until the ridge was struck that descends from the summit of the Trelatete in the direction of Mont Blanc. This was followed, and the highest (central) peak (12,900 feet) was arrived at by passing over the peak No. 3 (12,782). It is possible to descend from the highest point of this mountain on to the Glacier de Trelatete. I wished to adopt this course in 1864, but was outvoted. Mont Sue is a famous locality for crystals. We discovered several sparkling, fairy caves, encrusted with magnificent specimens, smoky and clear. As usual, the best were injured before they could be detached. 3 The Col du Chardonnet is about 11,000 or 11,100 feet above the level of the sea, involuntarily--talking was laborious; the breath froze instantaneously; eating was disagreeable; sitting was impossible! We looked towards our mountain. Its aspect was not encouraging. The ridge that led upwards had a spiked arete, palisaded with miniature aiguilles, banked up at their bases by heavy snowbeds, which led down, at considerable angles, on one side towards the Glacier de Saleinoz, on the other towards the Glacier du Chardonnet. Under any circumstances, it would have been a stiff piece of work to clamber up that way. Prudence and comfort counselled Give it up. Discretion overruled valour. Moore and Almer crossed the Col du Chardonnet to go to Orsieres, and we others returned towards Chamounix. But when we got some distance down we were tempted to stop, and to look back at the Aiguille dArgentiere. The sky was cloudless; no wind could be felt, nor sign of it perceived;

it was only eight oclock in the morning;
