

The Lobstick Trail (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Lobstick Trail One morning in particular had always stood out in the memory of Kirk Brander. The night before had been a big night - there had been a cabaret and drinks and girls and a drunken home-coming in the gray spring dawn. For Kirk had just turned twenty-three, and a half dozen of his boon companions had taken advantage of the occasion to assemble and paint the town its traditional hue in his honor. The next morning, much against his own will in the matter, he had been forced by a custom unbroken in the house of his uncle and guardian to appear as usual for breakfast. Kirks attempts at eating would have appeared pathetic to some - to his uncle they were funny. In fact, his uncle had enjoyed the humor of the situation without speaking for so long that Kirk had begun to fear he was on the point of losing his self-control. He could have borne with anything except his uncles good-humored silence. When the tension was at its highest point, however, relief came.
