

A Deep-Water Voyage (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Deep-Water Voyage For a number of years it had been my keen ambition to make a deep-water voyage, and several times I was on the point of starting to California via the Horn; but just as I had determined upon a vessel, something deterred me each time. At length, after my friends had professed the belief many times that I never would go to sea, and that it was merely a bluff on my part, I determined that, come what would, to sea I should go, and after some little difficulty persuaded my wife that it would be of incalculable benefit to her health; so that she finally decided to try not the Cape Horn voyage, but the passage to the East round the Cape of Good Hope. For many weeks I cast about me to find not only a suitable vessel, but an agreeable and gentlemanly skipper. For taking ones wife to sea is a vastly different affair from going alone and putting up with whatever may happen along. How disagreeable for ones wife it would be to sail with a skipper who proved to be an obdurate, bad-tempered man, who resorted to blows for the men upon every occasion, or who called down sea-blessings by the fathom upon the head of the second mate because the mizzen-royal-yard was braced in an eighth of an inch too much!
