Not illustrated. 1869 edition. Excerpt: ...bad humour, but have returned in much better. A pleasant tiny old house, the oldest in Cambridge, perhaps, that is really a pleasure to ones eyes; beams across the ceilings, and solid wood-work, and so forth. I went at nine, and back at half-past ten; that also is the right thing. Tea, coffee, and chocolate; that also is sensible. I am almost persuaded to be an Abolitionist, which, how-J ever, is not true; but I am a decided Free-soiler for the present, and entirely give up the cause of the Fugitive Slave Law., Emerson is the only profound man in this country. There are some other nice people at Concord; but for society generally the advantage is greatly on the side of Cambridge. Concord would be but dull, but the walks are far prettier than here. It is nearly an hours journey from Boston. People dont the least despise one for being poor in Cambridge, and indeed I recommend them not! There are two Miss and their mother living here; their father, now dead, was American minister for many years at and; and now one Miss teaches French, and the other music. My opinion is that the true position in this country is that of comparative poverty. No sort of real superiority of breeding or anything attaches as it does in England to the rich. The poor man can get his children educated at the public schools, to which the rich children go also, for nothing, prepared for college even. And very few people indeed are so rich by patrimony as not to be in business. What I mean by mysticism, is letting feelings run on without thinking of the reality of their object, letting them out merely like water. The plain rule in all matters is, not to think what you are thinking about the question, but to look straight out at the things and let them affect you; otherwise...
