Not illustrated. 1801 Excerpt: ...whisper, and leaning his hand on the horses mane, our friend Roland is rather too far in the category Savage for long endurance. He grows capricious and self-opinionated. The thin plating comes off and shows the Buccaneer at every slight abrasion. What of that? said Frobisher, languidly. His book on Couttss is unexceptionable. Come, Tom, you are the only man here who has a head for these things. Do exert yourself and set something a-going. Well, what shall it be? said he, gaily. Shall we get the country people together, and have hack races?--shall we assemble the squires, and have a ball?--shall we start private theatricals? Wrhat says Miss Meek? I vote for all three. Pray do, Mr. Linton, you, who are so clever, and can do every thing, make us gay. l? we only go on, as we have begun, the house will be like a model prison--on the separate and silent system. As you wish it, said Linton, bowing with assumed gallantry, and now to work at once. So saying, he turned towards the house, the others riding at either side of him. What shall we do about Derwents letter, Tom? asked Frobisher. Never speak of it; the chances are that he has heard enough to satisfy the most gluttonous curiosity. Besides, he has lost his Yacht. Here he dropped his voice to a low muttering, as he said, and, may soon have a heavier loss! Is his pace too fast? said Frobisher, who caught up the meaning, although not the words. Linton made no reply, for his thoughts were on another track; then suddenly catching himself, he said, Come, and let us have a look at the stables. Ive not seen our stud yet, and they turned off from the main ap...
