Not illustrated. 1859 Excerpt: ...maximum, the first to whom relief is refused will be the young and the strong: in other words, the most absurd and extravagant consequences of the present Poor-laws will be the first cured. Such, then, is our conception of the bill which ought to be brought into Parliament--a maximum regulated by the greatest amount of Poor-rates ever paid, and annually diminishing at the rate of 10s. per cent, till they are reduced 20 per cent of their present value; with such a preamble to the bill as will make it fair and consistent for any future Parliament to continue the reduction. If Mr. Scarlett will bring in a short and simple bill to this effect, and not mingle with it any other parochial improvements, and will persevere in such a bill for two or three years, we believe he will carry it; and we are certain he will confer, by such a measure, a lasting benefit upon his country--and upon none more than upon its labouring poor. We presume there are very few persons who will imagine such a measure to be deficient in vigour. That the Poor-laws should be stopped in their fatal encroachment upon property, and unhappy multiplication of the human species,--and not only this, but that the evil should be put in a state of diminution,--would be an improvement of our condition almost beyond hope. The tendency of fears and objections will all lie the other way; and a bill of this nature will not be accused of inertness, but of rashness, cruelty, and innovation. We cannot now enter into the question of the Poor-laws, of 11 others that which has undergone the most frequent and earnest discussion. On the whole reasoning is founded upon the assumption, that no system of laws was ever so completely calculated to destroy industry, foresight, and economy in the poor; to extinguish compassio...
